So, walking in the night far from a town, but near a railway station, the train may be heard stopping, then going on, and the sound getting fainter and fainter till it is almost impossible to believe that it is really heard. Then some trifle attracts the attention and the sound is gone. No! it is not; there it is again. And for a few moments there is no deciding whether this is an echoia the mind (or rather the ear) of the former cound or a fresh train becoming audible. In another instant it comes to nothing, or else the new train rushes up.

Many years ago, when there were more shepherds then there are now on the Wiltshire downs, it was commonly known that most of these men always knew when the guns were being fired at Portsmouth, which is due south of this somewhat elevated range of bare downs, and fully 40 miles from them. The aged vicar of a village thereabouts used to say that he frequently heard them during his youth and middle age when once the sound had been pointed out to him. He would not have known what it was himself. It was somewhat like the distant shooting of stones from a cast, or the remote rumbling of thunder, but it was not very like either. And when the she herds had called his attention to it, he had sat down with them and listened, and discovered how regularly it was timed, or what bursts there were of it, till his reason had been quite convinced that it could be nothing else, Perhaps the Portsmouth guns can be heard even better there now than formerly, for some of them are much heavier; but it is only an experienced ear to which the sound has any sig-

The ear is more trusty in catching a new sound than in letting an old one go; and the slightly sharp noise of horses' hoofs is more distinctive than the duller rumble of a distant train. The greatest proof of fine bearing in this case was the first catching the sound of the oncoming coach.
